

This is a conversation between Ralph Allison and Charity, a Professor CIE.

COURSE IN MIRACLES

Ralph: No, I just wish you would sit down and write it and I would put my name on it. That is the easy way out.

Charity: For your learning you need to go through this.

R: Can't I just read it when it is all done? I'm joking.

C: We can stop.

R: It would just seem to be so efficient if you would tell me what to write and I would write it and get it over with.

C: No.

R: No. It won't work that way.

C: Not in this

R: You are not going to do it that way, huh?

C: No.

R: I tried.

C: But you also have the matter of stopping at any time.

R: And you do know how bored I would be and there isn't much else that I have lined up to do that I have got to do.

C: We know. You still bring that up to yourself.

R: I also don't play golf all day long.

C: We know that. We know that you would become extremely vacant, you would fill out that chair with your physical being and not move. And that would be your existence.

R: Well, I'm not interested in pursuing that direction.

C: So you have your choice.

R: I haven't rejected, you are knowing what you want in it, you could sit there typing it all out on the typewriter.

C: We could.

R: That is what that book was, "The Course in Miracles."

C: We are not going to do that.

R: She just sat there and that sounded pretty easy for her.

C: We are not going to do that.

R: It hadn't changed the world either.

C: No, it's not going to. It's a false book.
